

Annalisa Baruffi is a social worker with over fifteen years of experience spanning frontline practice, project management, and international policy. She began her career in child protection and disability services in Italy, before moving on to coordinate local social policies on social inclusion. In recent years, she has worked with the United Nations in Geneva, contributing to global initiatives on health and care workers, ageing, and the care economy.

Annalisa holds a Bachelor's degree in Social Work and a Master's degree in Social Policies from the University of Milan - Bicocca, as well as a Master of Advanced Studies in European and International Governance from the University of Geneva. Her academic background has strengthened her ability to bridge local practice with international policy, always grounded in the values and principles of social work.

Annalisa brings to her role as IFSW Representative to the UN a strong commitment to advancing social justice and promoting the recognition of care as a cornerstone of equitable societies.
